While hard skills (or technical knowledge) are important, the increased use of technology in the workplace means that things can change quickly, and employers are looking for people who can demonstrate the human touch that machines cannot replace.

This new six-week micro-credential is designed to complement your hard skills by equipping you with foundational soft skills such as communication, creativity, productive conflict resolution, self-awareness, social intelligence, problem-solving, and process management.

All learners who complete the Essential Soft Skills Training micro-credential will receive a non-credit professional development certificate from the University of Victoria, Division of Continuing Studies.
